

Benefits of Martial Arts

Taekwondo was originally developed for the defense of oneself and others, and for the personal growth of the practitioner. Contemporary martial arts have taken those fundamental ideas and developed methods of applying the benefits gained from martial arts to everyday modern life.

The self defense aspect is not just physically dealing with violence; it is also avoiding violence altogether.

The physical benefits of Taekwondo include coordination, flexibility, balance, strength, and endurance. The moral benefits of Taekwondo include development of character, self-control, and an appreciative attitude. Personal achievement requires goal-setting, hard work and commitment, and these in turn build self-esteem.

exists for the study and practice of the Korean martial arts tradition.

The Alliance Taekwondo Center offers studies and training in three forms of traditional Korean martial arts; Taekwondo, Hapkido and Kumdo.

Kumdo, the Korean way of the sword, is also practiced by advanced students at the Alliance Taekwondo Center.

Alliance Martial Arts

Taekwondo - Taekwondo is a Korean word which means "The way of striking with the foot and hand." This system is the most advanced evolution of the Korean combat arts, with roots as old as the first century. It is a recognized Olympic sport, and is famous for kicking techniques. The authentic Taekwondo taught by Alliance includes much of the discipline required for true Martial Arts.

Taekwondo is a growing sport and well known for its kicking techniques

Hapkido - The Korean word "Hapkido" translates as "the way of harmony"; rightfully so, as it works with (rather than against) an opponent's force. This art specializes in sweeps, throws, joint locks, leverage and pressure points, and integrates Taekwondo striking.

Kumdo - Literally translated, this Korean word means "way of the sword." This Korean art very closely parallels Japan's Kendo. Kumbop, which is the more precise "sword method," allows for practice with a sharp sword, including cutting.
